The RBA ...

hiked the cash rate by 25bps to 3.85%, which is what everyone had anticipated, but from there on, the forecasts went out the window as the central bank's outlook was more hawkish than anyone had anticipated.

The decision was unanimous, with the central bank warning that inflationary pressures had strengthened significantly stating, "A wide range of data over recent months have confirmed that inflationary pressures picked up materially in H2 2025. While part of the pick-up in inflation is assessed to reflect temporary factors, it is evident that private demand is growing more quickly than expected, capacity pressures are greater than previously assessed, and labour market conditions are a little tight." Ultimately, "The Board judged that inflation is likely to remain above target for some time, and it was appropriate to increase the cash rate target." The central bank also lifted its inflation track higher with headline CPI projected to peak above 4.0% by mid-year, before the electricity rebates roll off. It also upgraded its growth forecasts in the near-term, although the profile fades further out. The statement also highlighted that, "The unemployment rate has been a little lower than expected and measures of labour underutilisation remain at low rates." The RBA is now forecasting a 4.20% cash rate by year end, which aligns with market pricing.

The AUD and Australian swap rates all jumped higher, which aligned with the broader trend. While the USD-index is lower, the antipodean currencies outperformed with AUD/USD back above 0.7000 and NZD/USD closing in on the 0.6050 level. The 10-year Australian bond yield jumped 5bps to 4.85%, the Treasury yield firmed a pip to 4.28%, while the 10-year NZ yield eased to 4.61%.

Equity markets fell 1.0%-2.0% as losses mounted in the tech sector amid costs pressures after Oracle announced it plans to raise equity and undertake a USD25bn bond issue to finance its AI infrastructure build. Finally, bargain hunting saw commodities bounce with gold and silver both rallying 5.0%, copper gaining 3.7%, and oil firming 1.6%. FYI ... the GDT auction results have been delayed due to technical issues.

The 2nd tier data releases ...

saw US consumer optimism rise to its highest level since August at 48.8, while the 6-month outlook gained 1.2% to 43.8. The US logistics manager's index rose to a 7-month high at 59.6.

Fed voter Tom Barkin confirmed, "I am concerned about employment and inflation. The Fed is facing a different question now, with inflation above target, than the Greenspan-led Fed did in the 1990s" although colleague Stephen Miran continued to make the case for aggressive rate cuts this year stating, "I'm probably looking for a little bit more than a point of interest rate cuts over the course of the year." By a 'point' he means 100bps of cuts.

Japanese finance minister Katayama avoided confirming or denying there had been any FX intervention. She also pushed back on the idea that PM Takaichi was "talking up" a weak JPY.

The US military shot down an Iranian drone that approached a US Navy aircraft carrier in the Arabian Sea.

An interesting piece on gold ...

which backs up what we've been saying for a while now. Goldmans believes the recent rally in gold is structurally driven by central bank USD-dollar diversification, not speculative excess. Gold markets are small, which amplifies the price impact of incremental demand, with speculative positioning remaining limited relative to historical episodes. With central bank diversification away from the USD the key catalyst, Goldmans favours pairing equities with gold, not bonds, thus supporting gold as a long-term role in portfolios. Somewhat unsurprisingly, gold rose more than 5.0% to above $4,900 per ounce as bargain hunting emerged after two consecutive sessions of selling.
